Bertram Copes Year. By Henry B. Fuller. Ralph Fletcher Seymour. The Clanking of Chains. By Brinsley MacNamara. Brentanos. CHIEFLY ABOUT BUGS BY WALTER PRICHARD EATON THE great Fabre was endowed with infinite patience and great literary charm, but all save the most casual of his readers must always be aware that his refusal to allow more than intuitive instinct to insects was due less to scientific caution than to scientific preconceptions. Phil and Nellie Rau, of St. Louis, in their book, Wasp Studies Afield, cannot be said to show less patience than the great Frenchman himself, though their literary charm is less. But they are also less troubled by preconceptions, more attentive to the variations, and they have profited by the modern trend of psychological investigation. The results of their field studies of both solitary and social wasps, and of such experiments as can be conducted in the field, or the field laboratory, dispel not a little of that mystery which was always Fabre's final Solution. Their experiments with Polistes Pallipes, for example (the social wasps which build their paper houses on our barns), tend quite conclusively to show that this wasp develops a place memory by experience in flying about; and those who are removed far from the nest without such experience cannot get home, while the experienced ones (especially the queens, who live more than one year), can often find their way back from as much as two miles...
