ENERGY A CONSTANT QUANTITY. To the ordinary mind Energy and Force represent the same thing. And it has not been many years, comparatively, since even scientific men used the words synonymously. Modern chemistry and modern physics make a distinction, and define the two words differently. Force is defined as the cause of motion, or the generator of momentum, while Energy is expressed in the motion itself, in its power to do work. Force refers to the causes, while energy refers to work or the capacity to do work. The distinction is one that is difficult to make plain. Strictly defined, Force is any agency that can cause a motion, arrest a motion, or change the direction of a motion, while Energy is motion or the capacity to become motion, and this carries with it the idea of work. Force will be more fully defined farther on. There are two kinds of energy--kinetic or moving energy, and potential or energy of position. In discussing this subject it is our wish to get clearly into the mind of the reader the great physical law known as the conservation of energy; how it is related to animal and vegetable existence and especially how it may be related, if at all, to that higher order of existence that seems to be so intimately connected with the mind and soul. The phrase conservation of energy does not cover the whole subject that it is intended...
