Kate gave the best and the most answers on the whole. You need not look incredulous, Frances (for that little girl looked up in surprise). See, here are my proofs (and she held up some papers). I have not failed to notice, my dear, how you underrate your sister; and as I had a suspicion that Kate could do better than you expected, I took the precaution of noting down all your answers. The only thing, Frances, in which you excelled her this morning was geography. In everything else Kate was first. How mean to take advantage of us in that way, thought Frances; I should have done better, if I had known what aunt was doing; and she tried to conceal her mortification over her work. Kate blushed with pleasure at the unusual praise, and Alice and Arthur were delighted. They could not help feeling satisfaction at Frances getting the rebuff her conceit merited; and Mrs. Seymour continued, I do not think, Kate, you need despair about yourself. You must exert yourself, my dear girl; you may perhaps be slow at learning, which always makes a person appear duller than others; but from what I have seen of you both, I am sure you are pretty nearly equal in ordinary things. But only in ordinary things, aunt, said Kate, whose momentary elation was subsiding, and giving place to her usual desponding opinion of herself. You only asked...
