Is War ever justifiable? Many seem inclined to decide this question in the negative. From the tone of their remarks, one would suppose that it were better to suffer any and all calamities rather than appeal to arms as a remedy; that not even the preservation of national existence is an object of sufficient magnitude to justify the shedding of human blood; that to rejoice over victories which, though they may have saved our country, have nevertheless been gained at the cost of precious lives, is unbecoming a Christian people; and that no church, or minister of Christ, can consistently offer public thanks to God on an occasion associated with so many bloody horrors. Much has been said, written and done, that fully implies all this and more; and the Bible has been confidently appealed to in justification of these views. We accept the appeal, and challenge any one to show that the Scriptures condemn war indiscriminately and under all circumstances. Wars conceived in the lust of ambition and malice, are indeed condemned, - but wars forced upon us by the injustice and wickedness of others, - wars which we cannot decline without forfeiting our high and sacred trust as a nation, - wars involving principles of highest moment to our race, -...
